Extreme weather takes toll on Australian dairy production – report

Weather extremes of floods and hot dry conditions have taken their toll on Australia's milk season, with production taking a turn for the worse in recent months, according to the newly-released Rabobank Dairy Quarterly report.

The report says national dairy production was down 5.5 per cent year-on-year in January, 2013 as flooding impacted Australia's northern dairy regions and hot dry conditions hampered output in the southern export regions.

While globally, reduced supply overall from the southern hemisphere season, which has also been impacted by drought in New Zealand, is seeing dairy markets tighten.

And looking ahead as the season winds down, the report says, Australian milk volumes are likely to come under further pressure unless weather conditions improve, with dairy farmers in need of a strong early autumn break.

Rabobank senior dairy analyst Michael Harvey says Rabobank expects Australian milk production to come in just 0.7 per cent above prior-year levels for the first half 2013.

And while production is down, export demand has been up. The report says from July to December 2012, Australian dairy exports were running 9.5 per cent higher than year-ago levels. "With most export supply now sold, trading activity will be quiet until the new selling season," Mr Harvey said.

Looking internationally, the Rabobank Dairy Quarterly says, the global market tightened considerably in mid-March and looks set to remain tight through the next six months.

"As was anticipated, the back end of the southern hemisphere season has been poor, exacerbated by extreme weather in several regions, including Australia and particularly New Zealand, which has been impacted by drought," Mr Harvey said.

"March saw the upward phase of global dairy prices enter its ninth month and finally gain momentum."

The report says ongoing contraction of dairy supply in key surplus regions and incremental demand for production in import regions should prove enough to keep the international market tight through Q2 of 2013, despite the lacklustre global economic outlook.
